Conceptualizing Nationalism, Nations and States (□□□□ □□□□ □□□□□□ □□□□□□□□ □□ unit □□ !)

Nationalism is the most influential force in international affairs. It has caused the outbreak of revolutions and wars across the globe. It is noted as a factor for the collapse of age old empires, marker for new borders, a powerful component for the emergence of new states and it is used to reshape and reinforce regimes in history.

Last concept :

In an ideal nation state, the entire population of the state pledges allegiance to the national culture. Therefore, we can say that this population is homogenous. Moreover, every member of the nation is a permanent resident of the nation state. There are no pure nation states. Japan and Iceland are examples of countries that come close to the concept of a pure nation state.

International Relations (IR) traditionally focused on interactions between states.

International Relations (IR) is a discipline that studies the interactions between states and other actors in the international system. It explores the causes and consequences of international conflict, cooperation, and the distribution of power. Key questions in IR include: How do states behave? What are the interests of states? How do international organizations and non-state actors influence the system? IR is a broad field that encompasses a wide range of topics, including international law, international politics, international economics, and international social relations.

However, this conventional view has been broadened over the years to include relationships between all sorts of political entities ('polities'), including international organizations, multinational corporations, societies and citizens.

IR is a discipline that studies the interactions between states and other actors in the international system. It explores the causes and consequences of international conflict, cooperation, and the distribution of power. Key questions in IR include: How do states behave? What are the interests of states? How do international organizations and non-state actors influence the system? IR is a broad field that encompasses a wide range of topics, including international law, international politics, international economics, and international social relations. The United Nations, the African Union, the International Group of Experts (IGAD), and the International Court of Justice are some of the key international organizations that play a role in the international system. The International Court of Justice is the principal judicial organ of the United Nations. It is responsible for settling disputes between states and for giving advisory opinions on legal questions referred to it by the United Nations and other international organizations. The International Court of Justice is composed of 15 judges, who are elected by the United Nations General Assembly and the Security Council. The International Court of Justice is located in The Hague, the Netherlands.

IR captures a vast array of themes ranging from the growing interconnectedness of people to old and new forms of security, dialogue and conflict between visions, beliefs and ideologies, the environment, space, the global economy, poverty and climate change. The sheer number of actors and issues that are relevant to IR can be overwhelming. This can make it seem like a daunting task to not just study various aspects of IR but to try to grasp the bigger picture.

We could say that the increased focus on non-state actors and cross-border issues has marked a close-to-revolutionary turn in IR; something that could be interpreted as a shift away from the inter-national ("between-states") to the "trans-national" ("across/beyond-states" and their borders).

Individuals and groups interact across borders and thus relativize the meaning of space and territory as conventional IR knew it. International commercial aviation and the rapid spread of information technologies has further increased people’s mobility and the rate at which interactions occur across and beyond state borders.

Individual Levels of Analysis.

International relations can be analyzed from the perspective of individuals. Here we would look at the behaviors, motivations, beliefs and orientation of the individual in affecting a particular international phenomenon.

International relations (IR) is a field of study that examines the interactions between states, international organizations, and other actors in the global system. It focuses on the behavior of states and the factors that influence their actions, such as power, interests, and norms. IR also explores the role of international law and the impact of globalization on the world.

Individual Levels of Analysis is a perspective that focuses on the actions and decisions of individuals. It examines the psychological, social, and cultural factors that influence individual behavior. This level of analysis is often used to explain the actions of leaders and policymakers. For example, a leader's personal beliefs and values can shape their foreign policy decisions.

If looking at the actions of individuals, we would likely also need to engage with the implications of human nature. This can be seen in the psychology and emotions behind people's actions and decisions, their fears and their visions as well as their access to information and capacity to make a difference.

Human nature is a complex and debated topic. Some argue that humans are inherently good, while others believe we are inherently selfish. The study of human nature can help us understand the motivations behind individual actions and the challenges we face as a society. It can also inform our efforts to create a more just and equitable world.

State(Domestic) Level of Analysis.

Although this idea of the global or system level as a context of anarchy features in many contributions to the IR literature, the main focus remains on the state as the dominant unit of analysis.

Global(system) level of analysis

states(system)

This enduring focus on the state, and therefore, on the state level of analysis, is referred to as the relative "state-centrism" of the discipline. This means that IR scholars would generally not only regard states as the central unit of analysis as such, they also conceive of the state as a point of reference for other types of actor.

A state level analysis might be interested to look at any one of the following:

1) State level of analysis can consider states as actors in their own right as if they were clearly defined entities that have certain preferences, and accordingly, look at their actions and decisions to find an answer to our analytical questions.

2) it may look at how states interact with each other to deal with the crisis – in other words, their foreign policy; how they build off each other’s suggestions and react to international developments and trends; how they cooperate, say, in the framework of international organizations; or how we look at them as competitors and antagonists, each of them pushing for a stronger position in what makes up the world economy.

state-level study would also require careful consideration of what kinds of states we are looking at (how they are ordered politically), their geographical position, their historical ties and experiences and their economic standing. You might visualize it as a level above the state. Particularly important in that context is the distribution of power amongst states, meaning, whether there is one main concentration of power (unipolarity), two (bipolarity) or several (multipolarity).

The view of states being embedded in a global context traditionally comes with the assumption that our international system is "anarchic".

An anarchic system is one that lacks a central government (or international sovereign) that regulates and controls what happens to states in their dealings with each other.

International Relations scholars maintain that political power is usually distributed into three main types of systems namely:

- 1) uni-polar system
- 2) bipolar system and
- 3) multipolar system.

Uni-Polar System

In a uni-polar international system, there is one state with the greatest political, economic, cultural and military power and hence the ability to totally control other states.

bipolar system is that it is vulnerable for zero-sum game politics because when one superpower gains the other would inevitably lose.

One typical historical example where the world was under bipolar system is the cold war period.

Taking liberal ideas into practice, US President Woodrow Wilson addressed his famous "Fourteen Points" to the US Congress in January 1918 during the final year of the First World War. As he presented his ideas for a rebuilt world beyond the war, the last of his points was to create a general association of nations, which became the League of Nations.

With foundations in the Enlightenment and the eighteenth century, liberal internationalism, as Scott Burchill points out, suggested that "the prospects for the elimination of war lay with a preference for democracy over aristocracy, free trade over autarky, and collective security over the balance of power system".

For it was just such thinking, based as it was on the premise that relations between states are determined solely by the pursuit of power, which led to violations of international law and ultimately to the outbreak of war in 1914. A system of "collective security" was advocated to replace antagonistic alliance systems with an international.

Realism is a theory that claims to explain the reality of international politics. Realism emphasises the constraints on politics that result from humankind's egoistic nature and the absence of a central authority above the state.

Though liberal internationalist ideals are now recognized for their significant contribution in the development of normative approaches to the subject, they seemed, at the outset of the 1930s and ultimately the outbreak of the Second World War, futile and utopian. Thus it was that the subject matter of international relations, dominated as it had been by international law and diplomatic history, was transformed to an intellectual agenda which placed power and self-interest at the forefront of concern.

The formative assumptions of realism as a school of thought centre on the view that the international system is "anarchic", in the sense that it is devoid of an all-encompassing authority.

Anarchy

Where domestic society is ruled by a single system of government, the international system of states lacks such a basis and renders inter-national law non-binding and ultimately ineffectual in the regulation of relations between states. Conflict is hence an inevitable and continual feature of inter-national relations.

sought foundations in the Enlightenment and the birth of reason so realism locates its roots

Thucydides and his account of the Peloponnesian War is read as the formative paradigmatic text in that it covers themes such as power, intrigue, conquest, alliance-building and the intricacies of bargaining. Here we see portrayed a system of city states, the units or members of which are self-reliant and independent, with war breaking out in 431 BC.

Hans Morgenthau, whose Politics among Nations(1948) leads the realist perspective, points to a clear line of descent from Thucydides when he asserts that "realism" assumes that its key concept of interest defined as power is an objective category which is universally valid, but it does not endow that concept with a meaning that is fixed once and for all.

Thomas Hobbes is often mentioned in discussions of realism due to his description of the brutality of life during the English Civil War of 1642–1651. Hobbes described human beings as living in an order-less "state of nature" that he perceived as a war of all against all.

Kenneth Waltz's "Man, the State and War"(1959) and his later and absolutely dominated the discipline and some would argue do so to the present day.

Where Morgenthau's realism concentrates on the attributes and behavior of states within the international system, Waltz focuses on the international system itself and seeks to provide a structuralist account of its dynamics and the constraints it imposes on state behavior.

The international system is, for Waltz, anarchical and hence perpetually threatening and conflictual. What is of interest to Waltz is not the set of motives which may determine state behavior, but the imperatives of the international system and the distribution of capabilities within it.

This is hence a structural account, but it is an account that markedly differs in approach and substantive content from the neo-Marxist structuralism outlined below. It has much akin to realism and must therefore be placed within that perspective.

Conversely, realists tend to dismiss optimism as a form of misplaced idealism and instead they arrive at a more pessimistic view. This is due to their focus on the centrality of the state and its need for security and survival in an anarchical system where it can only truly rely on itself.

As a result, realists reach an array of accounts that describe IR as a system where war and conflict is common and periods of peace are merely times when states are preparing for future conflict.

Another point to keep in mind is that each of the overarching approaches in IR possesses a different perspective on the nature of the state. Both liberalism and realism consider the state to be the dominant actor in IR, although liberalism does add a role for non-state actors such as international organizations.

Nevertheless, within both theories states themselves are typically regarded as possessing ultimate power. This includes the capacity to enforce decisions, such as declaring war on another nation, or conversely treaties that may bind states to certain agreements.

In terms of liberalism, its proponents argue that organizations are valuable in assisting states in formulating decisions and helping to formalize cooperation that leads to peaceful outcomes.

Realism vs. Liberalism

- Realism: Emphasis on conflicts between states; state interests are constant — security and survival
- Liberalism: Emphasis on cooperation between states; optimism for change and progress
- But sometimes realists are more cautious about using force abroad (or, liberals more supportive of using force for a "good" cause)

1. International level.	Other actors e.g. individuals, IOs, MNCs also play an important role.
2. States are rational actors and aim for their own self interest/ relative gain.	2. States are not rational actors. They aim for absolute gain.
3. Realists believe in maximizing military power in order to achieve peace and security.	3. Liberalists believe that security can be achieved by cooperation, mutual gaining, applying moral/ethical principles.
4. Realists believe in the concept of armament, i.e. states should have arms and weapons for self security.	4. Liberalists believe in the concept of disarmament for self security i.e. cooperation.
5. According to realists international system is anarchic in nature.	5. According to liberalists international system is community based.

Capitalism is a system where the means of production are privately owned and operated for profit. It is characterized by free markets, competition, and the accumulation of capital. almost all modern economies are based on capitalism.

Karl Marx was a philosopher, economist, and revolutionary socialist. He is best known for his theory of Capitalism and Marxism, which argue that society is divided into two classes: the bourgeoisie (the ruling class) and the proletariat (the working class).

Marxism is an ideology that argues that a capitalist society is divided into two contradictory classes – the business class (the bourgeoisie) and the working class (the proletariat).

The proletariats are at the mercy of the bourgeoisie who control their wages and therefore their standard of living. Marx hoped for an eventual end to the class society and overthrow of the bourgeoisie by the proletariat.

Marxism is a political and economic theory developed by Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels. It is based on the idea that society is structured into classes, and that the ruling class exploits the working class. Marxism is a form of socialism that seeks to abolish private property and replace it with collective ownership. It is a theory of social and economic organization that is based on the idea of class struggle. Marxism is a political and economic theory that is based on the idea of class struggle. Marxism

Ideology

Marxist idea meaning a set of beliefs that serve the interests of a dominant social group by justifying their privileged position.

Bourgeoisie

Capitalist class, owners of the means of production. Marx argues that the ownership of production gives the capitalist class power.

Capitalism

an economic and political system in which a country's trade and industry are controlled by private owners for profit, rather than by the state.

Proletariat

Working class in a capitalist society. "wage slaves" forced to sell their labour power to the bourgeoisie.

 - ✓His famous phrase “anarchy is what states make of it”.

□□□□□□ Wendt

Constructivism is a theory of international relations that argues that the international system is not anarchic. Instead, it is a system of states that are bound by shared norms and values. Constructivists argue that the international system is a social construct, meaning that it is created and maintained by the actions of states and other actors. They believe that the international system is not a fixed entity, but rather a dynamic one that can change over time. Constructivists also argue that the international system is not a zero-sum game, but rather a non-zero-sum game. This means that states can benefit from cooperation and collaboration, rather than from competition and conflict. Constructivism is a theory that has gained significant traction in the field of international relations in recent years. It offers a different perspective on the international system, one that is more optimistic and more focused on the potential for positive change.

International anarchy could even be replaced with a different system if a critical mass of other individuals (and by proxy the states they represent) accepted the idea.

International Relations is, then, a never-ending journey of change chronicling the accumulation of the accepted norms of the past and the emerging norms of the future. As such, constructivists seek to study this process.

According to Plato

The good of the polis (that is the public good) could best be arrived at by philosopher king aided by a few highly learned, detached and fairminded advisors.

Plato's ideas have been used as the inspiration for dictatorial forms of government ✓ assuming that they should emphasize substance and wisdom of policies rather than procedural issues such as public debate, consultation, participation and criticism.

✓ one person with strength, wisdom, knowledge, and, above all, power can make good decisions than participatory decision making.

Foreign Policy Behaviour : Pattrens and Trends.

☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ (behaviour) ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐

Foreign policy behavior refers to the actions states take towards each other.

Global trends

behaviour

✓these actions usually are not as ends in themselves, but are tied in some way with larger purposes, from long range objectives to short term objectives.

Arnold Wolfers, a famous specialist in the field of International Relations, suggested that all foreign policy behavior ultimately boils down to three possible patterns:

(1) self-preservation (maintaining the status quo);

(2) self-extension (revising the status quo in one's own favor);

(3) self-abnegation (revising the status quo in some else's favor)

International relations are characterized by a variety of different types of relationships between states. These relationships can be categorized into three main types: alignment (neutral), alliance, and non-alignment. Alignment refers to a state's position relative to other states, while alliance refers to a formal agreement between two or more states to support each other in the event of a conflict. Non-alignment refers to a state's refusal to align itself with any major power or group of powers.

A country's alignment behavior can vary from time to time during its history in response to changing circumstances and policy decisions. (Alignment refers to a state's position relative to other states, while alliance refers to a formal agreement between two or more states to support each other in the event of a conflict. Non-alignment refers to a state's refusal to align itself with any major power or group of powers.)

Nonalignment has been the foreign policy pattern of most developing state during cold war.

Most developing countries had a movement-Non Alignment Movement (NAM) in which they called for a new foreign policy path/choice/ to be followed disregarding the both the West and East bloc politics and alliances.

Although that was practically impossible, NAM had noble agenda that called for the South-south cooperation.

3) Isolationism

isolationism is National policy of avoiding political or economic entanglements with other countries.

weakness or geographic remoteness, may cause the scope of a country's foreign policy to become so narrow that isolationism results.

This was the case with Burma in 1960 and 70s. Few countries have ever been totally cut off from the outside world, and in an age of interdependence, isolationism becomes an increasingly less viable foreign policy orientation. Some of the known global actors such as United States of America, China, and the ex-USSR all have passed through period of relative isolationism.

"Carrot and Stick Approach" Carrot and Stick Approach

Carrot and Stick Approach is a foreign policy strategy that uses incentives (carrots) and threats (sticks) to influence other states. It is based on the idea that states will behave differently if they see the benefits of cooperation or the costs of non-compliance. This approach is often used in international relations, especially in the context of trade negotiations and conflict resolution.

There hardly exists a state that is self sufficient. There is a considerable degree of dependence up on trade among states. But the degree of dependence and interdependence varies across states. Some states are strong and capable as compared to other states.

To control imports of some commodities, governments may establish quotas rather than tariffs (tariffs may of course be applied to the items enter under quota).

Under such arrangement, the supplier usually sends his goods into the country at a favorable price, but is allowed to sell only a certain amount in a given time period.

Chapter Three - International Political Economy(IPE).

Meaning and Nature of IPE.

International Political Economy (IPE) is a branch of political science that studies the interaction between international politics and the economy. It focuses on the economic and political relations between states and other actors in the international system.

As it developed in the 21st century, mercantilism (or neo-mercantilism) defended even a much more sophisticated and interventionist role of the state in the economy-for example, the role of identifying and developing strategic and targeted industries (i.e. industries considered vital to long-term economic growth) through a variety of means, including tax policy, subsidization, banking regulation, labor control, and interest-rate management.

According to mercantilists, states should also play a disciplinary role in the economy to ensure adequate levels of competition. (state) should also play a disciplinary role in the economy to ensure adequate levels of competition.

The proof of the relevance of mercantilist thought in the contemporary international political economy is found in the recent experience of the Japanese, South Korean, Taiwanese and Chinese national political economies whose states fulfilled the above stated roles almost perfectly.

However Instead of the term mercantilism, these states the East Asian economies (especially Japan, South Korea, and Taiwan) used the term "developmental state approach" (a less politically laden term) to describe the nature of their national political economy system.

In other words, liberal political economists believe that by removing barriers to the free movement of goods and services among countries, as well as within them, countries would be encouraged to specialize in producing certain goods, thereby contributing to the optimum utilization of resources such as land, labor, capital, and entrepreneurial ability worldwide.

If countries focused on what they do best and freely trade their goods with each other,all of them would benefit. The concept that captures this idea is also known as comparative advantage.

However, the theory of comparative advantage has been undermined by the current wave of economic globalization. The growth of transnational or multinational corporations(MNCs) complicates global trading. The production of goods and services is strongly influenced by costs, arbitrary specialization, and government and corporate policies.

Followingthe collapse of the Soviet Union in the 1990’s and the apparent embrace of the free market economy by a significant number of developing countries, there was a widely held belief that such phenomenon marks a clear failure and hence death of Marxism.

With the end of communism, the relevance of Marxism greatly declined, and liberalism has experienced a relatively considerable growth in influence. Around the world, more and more countries are accepting liberal principles as they open their economies to imports and foreign investment, scale down the role of the state in the economy, and shift to export-led growth strategies.

The basic argument of HST is simple: the root cause of the economic troubles that bedeviled Europe and much of the world in the Great Depression of the 1920s and 1930s was the absence of a benevolent hegemon — that is, a dominant state willing and able to take responsibility (in the sense of acting as an international lender of last resort as well as a consumer of last resort)for the smooth operation of the international (economic) system as a whole.

During its explanatory power to the Great Depression, HST has thus influenced the establishment of the Bretton Woods institutions (IMF and WB)- both being the products of American power and influence. On this point, it is specifically worth noting that Great Britain was given an important role to play but British interests and desires were clearly secondary. U.S. dominance was manifested, in particular, by the adoption of the U.S. blueprint for the IMF.

Structuralism : is a variant of the Marxist perspective and starts analysis from a practical diagnosis of the specific structural problems of the international liberal capitalist economic system whose main feature is centre-periphery (dependency) relationship between the Global North and the Global South which permanently resulted in an unequal (trade and investment) exchange.

The perspective is also known as the "Prebisch-Singer thesis" (named after its Latin American proponents Presbish and Singer) and it advocates for a new pattern of development based on industrialization via import substitution based on protectionist policies.

During the 1950s, this Latin American model spread to other countries in Asia and Africa and then the domestic promotion of manufacturing over agricultural and other types of primary production became a central objective in many development plans.

Although geography and distance still matters it is nevertheless the case that globalization is synonymous with a process of time-space compression-literally meant that in the shrinking world events or actions no longer coincides with the place in which it takes place.

globalization embodies a process of deterritorialization, () ...as social, political, and economic activities are increasingly stretched across the globe they become in a significant sense no longer organized solely according to territorial logic.

But it doesn't mean territory and borders are now irrelevant but rather to acknowledge that under condition of globalization this relative significance, as constrains of social action and exercise of power, is declining.

For them, the so called globalization is not more than regionalization that It have seen more interconnectedness at regional level lesser than at the global level.

For that matter, Skeptics argues that there is no free flow of goods, resources, technology and finance at the global level; instead we have regional based globalization. In this regard, it has become evident that the Western region is more intergraded and globalized than the other part of the world such as Africa and Asia.

Yet in terms of trade the developing countries are integrated to the western market whereby the developing countries supply their primary agricultural commodities to earn foreign currencies.

However such trade connection is not benefiting the developing nations. The Sceptics thus do not believe that globalization would help to narrow the economic and technological gap that is still prevailing between the Global North(developed Countries) and The Global South(Developing countries).

So, for the Skeptics, globalization brings nothing new, rather it is just the crystallization the already existing realities of the world which has been marked by the North-South gap reflected in terms of the deeply rooted patterns of in equality and hierarchy.

III. Transformationalists

TheoryGlobalisation

Central to the transformationalist perspective is the conviction that globalization is a critical driving force behind the rapid social, political and economic changes which are reshaping societies and international politics.

Transformatinalist Society ...!!

According to the proponents of this view ,the contemporary process of globalization are historically unprecedented such that governments and societies across the globe are having to adapt to a world in which there is no longer a clear distinction between the international and domestic affairs.

Globalization is a process that has been ongoing since the beginning of time. It is the process of increasing interconnectedness between people, places, and things. This process has been driven by a number of factors, including technological advances, economic globalization, and cultural exchange. Globalization has led to the growth of international trade, the spread of ideas and culture, and the development of a global economy. While globalization has many benefits, it also has some drawbacks, such as the loss of local identity and the spread of disease. Overall, globalization is a complex and multifaceted process that is shaping the world as we know it.

globalization is reconstituting or reengineering the power, function and the authority of the state.

Even though the state has ultimate legal power to control events inside its boundary, it can't command sole control over trans-boundary issues, actors, resource movements.

However : reject both the hyper globalist view of the end of the sovereign state as well as the Sceptics claim that nothing much has changed.

Instead they assert that a new sovereignty regime is displacing traditional conception of state power as an absolute, indivisible, territorially exclusive power.

Transformatonalist ... Global Local Issues /Affairs ... !

globalization does not Diminished the power of national government is necessarily diminished but on the contrary it is being redefined, reconstituted and restructured in response to the growing complexity of process of governance in a more interconnected world.

The cold war has had significant consequences for Africa. During its height in the 1960's and 1970's, the cold war witnessed the emergence of authoritarian regimes in most African Countries in the form of one-party or military regimes. This was largely a result of the support of the two blocks to keep African countries in their respective camps.

During the cold war, the two superpowers, the United States and the Soviet Union, fought a proxy war in Africa. They supported different African regimes to gain influence and control over the continent. The United States supported authoritarian regimes that were friendly to its interests, while the Soviet Union supported regimes that were friendly to its interests. This led to the emergence of authoritarian regimes in most African countries. The cold war also led to the division of Africa into two camps, the Western camp and the Eastern camp. The Western camp was led by the United States and the Eastern camp was led by the Soviet Union. The cold war also led to the emergence of one-party or military regimes in most African countries. This was largely a result of the support of the two blocks to keep African countries in their respective camps.

With the end of the cold war, support has been withdrawn by the major powers for many African countries considered no longer of strategic importance. This has entailed an increase in the number of so called “failed states” in Africa during the last two decades.

This was largely a result of the support of the two blocks to keep African countries in their respective camps.

An over-all decline in the strategic importance of Africa. This has, in turn, substantially reduced Africa's international negotiating power and ability to maneuver in the international system .

Specific impacts of globalization on Africa can be identified. In the political sphere, the most important consequence is the erosion of sovereignty, especially on economic and financial matters, as a result of the imposition of models, strategies and policies of development on African countries by the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and the World Trade Organization.

Globalization has negative impacts on Africa. One form of this is the reduction of the capacity of governments to determine and control events in their countries, and thus their accountability and responsiveness to their people, given the fact that the context, institutions and processes by which these decisions are taken are far from democratic.

On the other hand, globalization has promoted greater respect for human rights and contributed to the development of an African press. This has opened African countries to far greater scrutiny than in the past, making it somewhat more difficult for African governments to get away with blatant and excessive abuses of democratic governance and transparency.

Remark :

A spatial concept is the essence of regionalism. In this regard, the states that share geographical proximity and a degree of mutual interdependence will participate in their regional groupings .

(Karns and Mingst 2005).

Regionalism is a spatial concept that refers to the process of forming regions as geopolitical units, as organized political cooperation within a particular group of states, and/or as regional communities such as pluralistic security communities (Whiting 1993). Similarly, the term regionalism refers to the proneness of the governments and peoples of two or more states to establish voluntary associations and to pool together resources (material and nonmaterial) in order to create common functional and institutional arrangements.

As a dynamic process, it can be best understood as a continuing process of forming regions as geopolitical units, as organized political cooperation within a particular group of states, and/or as regional communities such as pluralistic security communities (Whiting 1993). Similarly, the term regionalism refers to the proneness of the governments and peoples of two or more states to establish voluntary associations and to pool together resources (material and nonmaterial) in order to create common functional and institutional arrangements.

Furthermore, regionalism can be best described as a process occurring in a given geographical region by which different types of actors (states, regional institutions, societal organizations and other non-state actors) come to share certain fundamental values and norms. These actors also participate in a growing network of economic, cultural, scientific, diplomatic, political, and military interactions

Convergence :

[Regionalization as a Component of Globalization]

Regionalism is emerging today as a potent force in the processes of globalization. If globalization is regarded as the compression of the temporal and spatial aspects of social relations, then regionalism may be understood as but one component, or ‘chapter’ of globalization .

(Mittelman 1996a, 189).

According to this view, by helping national economies to become more competitive in the world market, regional integration will lead to multilateral cooperation on a global scale, Thus, the process of regional integration can be interpreted as part of the international (or global) economic order a result and a component of globalization.

[Regionalization and Globalization as Parallel Processes]

When we refer to the world economy, it encompasses the trends of both regionalization[—i.e., the division of the international economy] and globalization

(see Wyatt-Walter 1995).

Conversely, in the international (global) security arena, it is more difficult to assess the (co)existence of security communities and security complexes without an overall dimension of global security, which is less evident.

Thus, rather than reacting to each other, a third possibility is that regionalization and globalization might act as parallel or overlapping processes in the two issue-areas of economics and security.

The persistence or resurgence of nationalism can be regarded as a response to the alienating forces of the global market, by relocating or bolstering legitimacy and loyalties at the national or even sub-national levels.

Globalization is a process of increasing interconnectedness and interdependence among countries, regions, and people. It is driven by technological advances, particularly in transportation and communication, which have reduced the barriers to trade and travel. Globalization has led to the growth of multinational corporations, the expansion of international trade, and the spread of cultural values and ideas. While globalization has brought many benefits, it has also been criticized for leading to the erosion of national sovereignty, the loss of local cultures, and the exacerbation of economic inequality.

This is directly contradiction to the transnational or supranational logic of economic globalization.

Globalization as a Force of Nationalism and the Formation of New States :

Globalization is a process of increasing interconnectedness and interdependence among countries, regions, and people. It is driven by technological advances, particularly in transportation and communication, which have reduced the barriers to trade and travel. Globalization has led to the growth of multinational corporations, the expansion of international trade, and the spread of cultural values and ideas. While globalization has brought many benefits, it has also been criticized for leading to the erosion of national sovereignty, the loss of local cultures, and the exacerbation of economic inequality.

Through a process of technological dissemination, globalization might actually promote nationalism and the formation of new states.

Hence, globalization and nationalism might converge, through a new (global) revolution of 'rising expectations,' which encourages states to cope with and to manage the forces of globalization.

Here lies an interesting paradox: [☐☐☐ ☐☐☐ ☐☐☐ ☐☐☐☐☐☐ ☐☐☐☐☐☐ ☐☐☐☐☐ !]

Although forces of globalization seem to undermine state sovereignty, technological changes might also improve the material conditions for the enhancement or resurgence of nationalistic trends. Thus, globalization creates new strategies and roles for the nation-state.

Nation-states might oppose forces of regionalization that attempt to transcend the power (and authority) of the state in a supranational direction by setting limits and constraints to the development of a regional identity and supranational institutions.

Thus, states will regard regional and sub-regional integration frameworks through the prism of international organizations with a limited mandate in terms of intervention, domestic jurisdiction, and the exercise of sovereignty.

In this sense, the logic of the ‘new regionalism’ is not very different from that of the ‘old’ security alliances. Due to nationalistic tendencies of the member-states that see frameworks of regional integration as a means to pool and increase their national power resources.

In both cases, the goal is to guarantee the bloc (region) members greater security in their international relations in a context of increasing vulnerability of either the world economy or global security.

(Axline 1996, 199)

Coexistence between Regionalism, Nationalism and Globalization :

☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐ ☐

In this case we have neither convergence nor divergence but rather coexistence—the three processes are taking place simultaneously. Thus, there might be parallel processes of globalization and continuing trends of fragmentation and disintegration.

Historically, political fragmentation, often manifested by the quest for national self-determination and the creation of new states, has been a trend with as much significance as the (parallel) forces of economic globalization.

(Holsti 1996a, 21–22)

Fragmentation

In this perspective the effects of globalization upon regionalization and especially on the nation-state are rather indeterminate: “the structural logic of globalization and the recent history of the global economy can be read as providing rationales for ‘high stateness’ as well as ‘low stateness’” (Evans 1997, 64).

Globalization and Regionalism
The relationship between globalization and regionalism is complex and often contradictory. While globalization is often seen as a force that erodes regional boundaries and promotes a global economy, regionalism is often seen as a response to globalization, where regions seek to protect their interests and identity. This tension is evident in the way that global economic integration has led to the rise of regional trade blocs and the strengthening of regional institutions. The result is a world where global and regional forces are constantly at odds, creating a dynamic and often unpredictable environment for nations and regions alike.

Nation-States as Mediators between Regionalism and Globalization :

States are active players in the world arena, and their policies are probably the single most important determinant of the scope and direction of both regionalization and globalization (see Holm and Sorensen 1995, 7).

The stronger the states, the more capable they are in coping with the intricacies of the economic, political, social, technological, and cultural dimensions of globalization. Conversely, the weaker they are, the more ‘penetrated’ or exposed to the vulnerabilities of the world economy and the temptations of a shallow world culture and ideology (see Evans 1997, 69–70).

Nation -States Opposing Globalization through Regionalism

Nationalism and globalization are linked dialectically. Globalization does not imply necessarily the erosion of the nation-state's authority but rather a needed change in state strategies and redirection of state energies.

Conversely, state strategies and state actions can determine the future directions of globalization.

One possible option open for states to cope with globalization is by enhancing processes of regionalization, such as the creation of free trade areas that recreate a double (and contradictory) logic of economic relations: liberal at the intraregional level but protectionist/mercantilist toward other rival regions or 'blocs.'

Not only have the operating structures changed– with world politics no longer defined essentially by an ideological–military struggle between two dominant centers of power controlled, respectively, by two ‘Superpowers’, the United States and the Soviet Union – but also, it is argued, the agenda of world politics has been transformed.

In the security arena, there are two main issues and challenges facing the emerging new world order.

These are: terrorism and nuclear proliferation.

Terrorism []

‘some one’s terrorist is another’s freedom fighter’ is often presented as a justification for the general acceptance of war as a legitimate instrument of even governments.

Experts believe that the reason for this is probably that the terrorists understand such weapons would lead to the likelihood that a state or the international community would focus its efforts on hunting them down, and eradicate them.

Fear of nuclear war dominated security planning during the cold war, and enhanced security was sought through arms control agreement between the two super powers.

The end of the cold war has led to a decrease in concern about the dangers of nuclear war between the super powers. This is paradoxical because the majority of nuclear weapons that were perceived to cause the problem still exist.

First!

The fact that nuclear weapons states have substantially maintained their nuclear arsenals shows that they consider that nuclear weapons play some positive role in providing security.

Moreover, the continued reliance on nuclear deterrence and the rhetoric of deterrence sends a signal to the rest of the international community that nuclear weapons are still useful.

This contradicts the explicit message that these same states are pushing, that horizontal proliferation should be prevented.

Second

There are now greater incentives to acquire nuclear weapons for those non-nuclear states who have lost the guarantee of extended deterrence previously provided by super powers.

For example, Pakistan now perceives itself to be vulnerable to attacks from India because the United States has scaled back its support for. India, which has lost the backing of the Soviet Union, in turn feels vulnerable to both Pakistan and China.

In such situations the instability caused by the breakdown of cold war alliances can be seen as an incentive to states to acquire a nuclear deterrent. In 1998 both India and Pakistan tested nuclear devices and joined the "nuclear group".

Fourth :

The contrasting experiences of Iraq and North Korea suggest strong incentives to proliferate fast and establish deterrence.

The 2003 US-led invasion of Iraq was explicitly justified in terms of Iraqi nuclear, chemical and biological weapons capabilities. By contrast, in the case of North Korea, the state is judged to have made too much progress in creating nuclear weapons for an attack to be feasible.

□2003 □□□ □□□□□ □□□□□ □□□ □□□□□ □□□□□ □□

In 2005 North Korea announced that it has nuclear weapons, ending years of speculation. It is also thought that Iran has not been slow to learn from these contrasting experiences. [□2005 □□□

Thus, in summary, not only have these incentives to proliferate increased, but speed and stealth have become more important to success, creating further problems for the international community.
